Woody and Mark are great pals. They hang out together, watch the game together, and play ball together. And ever since they took the same acting class in college, they've become hopeless theater buffs. Now, they want to write their own stage play, and take it on the road. But there's one problem. Woody is black, and Mark is white. And this causes some interesting reactions among the people they meet as they collaborate, rehearse and perform their play. The antics they endure range from the hilarious to the poignant, whether they're back stage, on stage or off. And the question remains, can these best buddies maintain their friendship when their lives have become one big color play?
