Development of the Manual

Originally, the Land Ordinance of May 20, 1785, itself served as the survey instructions. There is no record of additional instructions to or from the Chief Geographer.

More detailed regulations and instructions, improving the system for greater accuracy, permanency, and uniformity, were issued in book form as Manuals. These early Manuals of instructions were prepared by Surveying District Surveyors General, issued to their Deputy Surveyors, and pertained to a single district. The earliest known and extant instructions by a Surveyor General were issued in 1804 by Jared Mansfield. Knowledge of the specific Manual requirements for original surveys is key to the proper performance of subsequent surveys.

The early Manuals emphasized original surveys and contained little mention of retracements or resurveys. The need for increased instruction for the resurvey of public lands was marked by passage of the General Resurvey Act of March 3, 1909, as amended June 25, 1910 (43 U.S.C. 772). Retracement and resurvey responsibilities were further expanded with passage of the Act of September 21, 1918 (43 U.S.C. 773), which provides a general authorization for the definition of boundaries of those lands to which title has passed from Federal control. The first full Manual discussion of resurveys was contained in the Advance Sheets, published June 16, 1919, and became part of the Manual of 1930.
