Throughout history, humans have struggled to find sustenance in an uncaring world while maintaining their basic humanity. These are the questions of who we are and how we eat. The forms of each have changed in the shifting sands of time, but the search itself has proven to be a staple of our greater imaginings. So now, separated by thousands of years from our more primitive ancestors, those who laid the foundations for this modern world, who have we become? And how have we come to eat? This collection of short stories portrays one man's take on the answers to these questions, with each tale contributing its own unique brushstroke to the picture.
